LAST CHILD IN THE WOODS' author, Richard Louv to speak on Monday, March 7 at 7:30pm

in the EMU Ballroom.(1222 East 13th on UO campus). FREE. His talk "Beyond Nature-Deficit Disorder: The Restorative Power of the Natural World," exploring questions concerning the connections between family, nature, and community. Sponsored by the Oregon Humanities Center (541-346-3934 for questions and disability accommodations).

For those unable to attend Mr. Louv's talk Madison Meadow encourages you to read his book, which addresses our children's connection to the natural world. Nature needs children as much as children need nature.

Once again the Urban Ecology Class of The Network Charter School came to the Meadow on a cold November afternoon to help with the Native Plant Garden. The students assisted in planting several new varieties of native forbs* in the dedicated space, and also planted additional camas and native grasses throughout the Meadow.

Thanks to Camas Education Network for donating the plants, and to William Hughes and his students for giving their time.

All the chosen plants were once common in the Willamette Valley Ecoregion, which now has the heaviest urban, suburban, and rural development in the county. This Garden is part of the efforts of the Meadow to increase diversity and restore habitat within our neighborhood.

Please visit the Garden to read a list of plantings, and to watch them grow and bloom.

After the Network Charter students had finished helping with additions to the Native Plant garden a group of volunteers came to rebuild the fence around the area with re-used stakes and bamboo poles donated from a neighbor's back yard. The fence crew learned a little about "square lashing" from a former board member, and then wooden labels were placed next to the new plants with their common and Latin names.

In time, after the plantings become more established and substantial the Meadow board plans to remove the fence. Until then it's a reminder to visitors that the garden needs a little protection.
